Ode to Being Alive
for Occupy Wall Street

You are more than flesh and bone, more than circulating protons and neurons, more than a mass of ganglia and corpuscles rushing through your trembling heart on your urgent mission to join the expressway of restless multitudes on subways
in the daily crunch
to sit behind desks,
push buttons,
work copy machines
for the landlord,
electric company,
banks and latest fashions.
You are more than that heap of bills to be paid, more than your collection of lifeless objects, european furniture, flat-screen tv, cell phone and laptop, more than your hoard of books on endless shelves waiting to be embraced.
You are much more than the greedy war machines that plow the earth,
ruin the rainforests, hydrofracking the water to drain the global life force for profit and gain.
There is a part of you that is greater, that cannot be seen, touched, bought or sold, collected by any bank or sales company.
The essence of you cannot be owned or enslaved.
Your eternal spirit, fragile and precious, is a gift housed within you,

the real treasure of you that blossoms and wilts from the darkness of self, that connects one to another like a grain of sand in the vast ocean of being or a star in the constellations of galaxies adrift in cosmic space.
